Notes and Queries. Soll Analysts.

A writer in the Hampshire and Franklin Express published at Amherst, Massachusetts, bears the following testimony to the value of soil analysis:

Mr. Wm. P. Dickinson, of Hadley, had a field as thick and matted as the wool on the back of a sheep that will give a ten-pound fleece. The land of course must have been exceedingly unpromising for any crop. He procured an analysis of it by the late professor Norton, and was told that it was deficient in two or three ingredients, which could be cheeply supplied. For the analysis and a long letter, advising how to supply the defiencies in the cheapest possible manner, he paid $10, and was laughed at as commonly happens when a man ventures a step out of the beaten track. He ploughed that field and treated it in every respect as Professor Norton advised, with the exception of here and there a couple of rows. which were cultivated as he would have cultivated the whole if he had not been otherwise advised. The result is a crop of corn, now in the field, equal to perhaps twenty bushels to the acre where cultivated in the old way, and very nearly fifty where cultivated as Mr. Norton advised. This, I know, all might have been, and yet there be no increase of profit, for the extra corn and helds of similar land adjoining that to which Mr. Norton's prescription will apply. He values the advice much higher than its cost for its future application to each of those fields. Now may it not be de sirable for farmers to pay for analyses?

I have just been wandering about the country search of land belonging to some clients of mine, and in doing so have met with many amusing incidents. Only the other day, as a caravan of fare animals, including one that traveled with a trunk, was passing up, not Federal Hill, but Federal Creek, in Athens county. Ohio, it encountered a sturdy Buckeye driving a large bull. Now, this bull, unlike some people, had never seen 'the elephant' before, and when the "critter' came in sight commenced making his fore feet familiar with the 'free soil' and his lungs familiar with their accustomed exercise. His driver and owner warned Barnum's agent to get his elephant out of the way. But Mr. Barnum's agent said he would risk his elephant if Buckeye would risk his bull. Whereupon the Western Taurus renewed his bellowing and made a desperate lunge at the huge monster of India. The contest was somewhat similar to certain political ones, for the elephant with one blow from his trunk stretched the bull upon the ground, breaking three of his ribs and driving the breath so The most implacable enemy of O'Connell could not far from his body that it utterly refused to return. the body of a man embalmed with great care, but be touched and softened by a visit to Derrynane My Buckeye friend was obliged to be content with heaps of rosemary and aromatic leaves piled over Abbey at this day.
